

Japanese Expressions of Humiliation

Midori Suzuki, Tokyo, July 2004

From <http://www.kanjisite.com/>

Written Japanese uses three separate alphabets (four if we also count "romaji," the standard 26-letter English alphabet). Two of the three are syllabic. They are called hiragana and katakana, and consist of fairly simple characters used to represent syllables. Hiragana and katakana are known collectively as "kana". Kanji, however, are more complicated / difficult / beautiful / fascinating. Kanji was imported over the centuries from China. The pictograms are typically (much) more complex than kana ("kana" refers collectively to hiragana and katakana) and, furthermore, have different readings and meanings depending on how they are combined with other kanji. They represent ideas or words rather than syllables, although of course hiragana or katakana could be used to spell out the pronunciation.

侮辱 Bu joku: humiliation (the act of humiliation)

屈辱 Kutu joku: humiliation (feeling of humiliation)

耻辱 Chi joku: shame

国辱 Koku joku: national humiliation

It is koku joku! They humiliated a nation!

辱 the higher part of this kanji pictogram represents: tremble lower part: measure, inch
